THE theory advanced by Mr. Regon in the case of Chung Chu Shi v. Chu Kum Ting, that Chinese marriages' cannot be recognised by the law of this colony, is rather a Chinese wife sued her husband for maintenance, but Mr. REECE, who appeared for macriage, being a polygamous one, was not recognisable by English law, and he therefore sued under in alleged agreement by which the defendant was stated to have undertaken to pay a certain sum monthly case was adjourned to give the parties an opportunity of coming to settlement, and is therefore technically ed at the last hearing it would seem that there is not much likelihood of its on the news reaching that port. coming before the Court again. Under the circumstances, however, it would be improper at this stage to refer to the merits of the particular case even were those merits a matter of general interest; but the broad questions of the legality under English law of Chinese marriages, and of the rights of married women with regard to property, are fairly open to discussion. With regard to the former, the proclamation issued in the name of the Queen securing the Chinese inhabitants of Hougkong in the free exercise of their religious rites, ceremonies, and social customs has always been understood, we think, as covering their marriage customs, and therefore giving Chinese marriages a legal status. In the Straits Settlements Chinese produce belonging to a Foodbow man such marriages have been recognised by the Courts, as polygamous marriages are in .India, and in Hongkong also, if we are not mistaken, there are judgments on record giv. ing similar recognition. Mr. Reece went onto speak of the rights of married women in general, his remarks under this heading applying to both Europeans and Chinese, and here, as it seems to us, he was on firmer ground. The rights of married women in this Colonr are of the slenderest description. As Mr. Regue says, "married " women in this Colony have no power of "contract with respect to separate property. "They have no power to sue their husbands. "There is no divorce jurisdiction in this

Nor can she "obtain under any Act an order for main-"tenance simply on the ground that she is "descrited." It is to be hoped there are not many married women in the Colony consumed with a burning desire to prosecute their husbandsas roguesand vagabonds, but the condition of affairs above indicated is certainly an anomaly at the present day, when the rights of married women have been so largely extended in every other part of the Empire, In the treaty ports of China British subjects are governed by British law, and at Canton, for instance, a married woman may hold separate property and deal with it as she JORDAN ALMONDS, NOUGAT, BUT. likes, but let her takes six hours' journey to Hongkong and become domiciled in this British colony and her property at once passes to hor husband.
